the eighteenth letter in our alphabet, its corresponding symbol standing eighteenth in other alphabets, Latin, Greek, and Phœnician It belongs to the class of liquids, and in ancient Egyptian there seems to have been no clear distinction between the sounds of r and l—Consequently the hieroglyphic picture of the 'honesty,' from which our letter l is derived, was used almost interchangeably with the picture of the mouth, which became the source of the letter r The sound of r is a true consonant in the north of England, where it is exaggerated in the Northern brian burr, in the south it is often reduced to a semivowel, or even to a vowel while in the Midlands, in Scotland, and in France it preserves the proper sound of a trilled liquid which it had in Latin and Anglo Saxon From this trilling or vibration of the tip of the tongue the sound is often called the 'dog's letter' (littera canina) The Irish r is a survival of the more resonant old English sound, as in the pronunciation harum for 'harm' In English l frequently replaces r, and occasionally r replaces l, as in 'turban,' from tolbant Sometimes r disappears, as in 'speak' from A S sprecan, 'palsy' from O Fr paralyse It is intrusive in 'partridge,' 'culprit,' 'hoarse,' &c There is a modern tendency to insert a final r, as Victoriar for 'Victoria.'—The three R's, a humorous term for reading, writing, and arithmetic.
